

The Existence of God and the Problem of Evil and Suffering #1

Intro: The Greek philosopher Epicurus expressed the classic argument against the existence of God: “Either God wants to abolish evil, and cannot; or he can, but does not want to; or he cannot and does not want. If he wants to, but cannot, he is impotent. If he can, and does not want to, he is wicked. But, if God both can and wants to abolish evil, then how comes evil into the world?” The argument of Epicurus has a special appeal to those who reject God and is often offered as the primary proof of his non-existence.

However, the problem of evil in the world challenges people of faith as well. A Barna poll once asked adults, “If you could ask one question of God, what would it be?” 17% responded, “Why is there pain and suffering in the world?” Do you ever wonder where God is when evil ravages the innocent?

Can the problem of suffering be reconciled with the concept of the Bible’s God? Can a just and loving God exist, who also allows suffering and evil to exist? Let think about how we might respond to this commonly asserted argument.

The atheists (agnostics) argument from evil and suffering is self-contradictory.

The problem of evil and suffering might be considered as much an argument for God instead of one against Him! Consider this:

Those who argue that God cannot exist because of the evil and suffering in the world are making a moral judgment about God. In other words, a good God could not allow suffering and evil to exist. However if we use moral judgments to question the existence of God, then we, by those very judgments, suggest a standard of right and wrong exists. But how can right and wrong exist, if God doesn’t exist? If there is no God, then there can be no right or wrong.

So then, the argument that God cannot exist because of evil and suffering in the world is self-contradictory. If God doesn’t exist, as the atheist affirms, then good and evil cannot exist either. To argue from the premise that suffering is evil is to also be forced to acknowledge the existence of God!

The argument from evil and suffering reveals intellectual arrogance and presumes to know as much about the world as the Creator knows.

Is it not possible that God’s knowledge is far above our own; and what we do not understand is due to that difference?

I remember a nurse once describing how the children acted in the pediatric clinic. Their parents would bring them in for a follow up and they would be happy as mom and nurse played with them. And then without warning the nurse would prick them with a needle and child would suddenly break out in tears and with a look of bewilderment—“Why did you do that to me?”

But every parent understands that those shots, though bringing temporary pain, are necessary for the ultimate good of the child. And though the child may not understand what is going on at the moment, the parent is acting in complete love for their child by allowing them to experience that pain.

Is it possible that in the same way our knowledge is great than our children's, so God's knowledge is greater than ours? --that like children, we cannot know all that God knows and that we might not be able to fully understand from our limited perspective what He is doing?

To stand in judgment of God's actions is to presume to know at least as much about the world as God and to call into question the appropriateness of his actions. Those who rebuke God imply that their knowledge is as great as His. Is it true?

For who has known the mind of the Lord, or who became His counselor? Or who has first given to Him that it might be paid back to him again? (Romans 11:34-35)

When Job became testy about the way God had handled his situation, God responded by reminding Job of his limitations as man.

"Who is this that darkens counsel by words without knowledge? "Now gird up your loins like a man, and I will ask you, and you instruct Me! (Job 38:2-3)

There followings a barrage of questions about all aspects of the created world. Finally God closes His case with this statement:

"Will the faultfinder contend with the Almighty? Let him who reproves God answer it." (Job 40:2)

The power of the argument is undeniable: "If you cannot know what I know and do what I do, then why do you presume to judge my actions!?" We could wish that all men who "rebuke" God, would answer as Job!

"Behold, I am insignificant; what can I reply to Thee? I lay my hand on my mouth. Once I have spoken, and I will not answer; Even twice, and I will add no more." (Job 40:4-5)

If God's knowledge is far beyond our own, then is it possible that he might have purposes for suffering that we might not fully understand or know?

The argument from evil fails to consider that ultimate good may come from the existence evil and suffering.

Epicurus and other unbelievers deny that there is any necessary benefit to suffering and pain; but God can see what men often cannot see.

Can God then use our suffering for our good?

God may use suffering to build our character.

All of us must confess that to some degree we have stood by and watched others like our children struggle with some difficulty rather than intervene, knowing that overcoming the struggle would enable them to develop character and inner strength. And so it is with God, that He allows us to suffer that we might be strengthened.

But resist him, firm in your faith, knowing that the same experiences of suffering are being accomplished by your brethren who are in the world. And after you have suffered for a little while, the God of all grace, who called you to His eternal glory in Christ, will Himself perfect, confirm, strengthen and establish you. (1 Peter 5:9-10)

God may use suffering as a wake up call to the unrepentant.

CS Lewis called suffering a “megaphone to rouse a deaf world”. It is sometimes the suffering of a sinful life that causes us to draw near to God.

“Come to Me, all who are weary and heavy-laden, and I will give you rest. “Take My yoke upon you, and learn from Me, for I am gentle and humble in heart; and you shall find rest for your souls. “For My yoke is easy, and My load is light.” (Matthew 11:28-30)

God used human evil and suffering to bring about the greatest good ever accomplished on earth—the salvation of mankind from sin!

Human might well have asked at Jesus crucifixion, “How could any good thing have come from the unjust slaughter of an innocent person?”

and He Himself bore our sins in His body on the cross, that we might die to sin and live to righteousness; for by His wounds you were healed. (1 Peter 2:24)

Is it possible that what we do not see is the good that God can bring about through evil and suffering? He has already brought about our good through one of the most horrendous evils of the ages.

Conclusion: In our lesson tonight we will continue the conversation. I’ve tried today not to give trite or easy answers to these tough questions. But in the end, when all is said, the answer to all suffering is the cross. John Stott once wrote:

“I could never myself believe in God, if it were not for the cross...In the real world of pain, how could one worship a God who was immune to it? I have entered many Buddhist temples in different Asian countries and stood respectfully before the statue of Buddha, his legs crossed, arms folded, eyes closed, the ghost of a smile playing round his mouth, a remote look on his face, detached from the agonies of the world. But each time after a while I have had to turn away. And in imagination I have turned instead to that lonely, twisted, tortured figure on the cross, nails through hands and feet, back lacerated, limbs wrenched, brow bleeding from thorn-pricks, mouth dry and intolerably thirsty, plunged in God-forsaken darkness.

That is the God for me! He laid aside his immunity to pain. He entered our world of flesh and blood, tears and death. He suffered for us. Our sufferings become more manageable in light of his. There is still a question mark against human suffering, but over it we boldly stamp another mark, the cross which symbolizes divine suffering. “The cross of Christ...is God’s only self-justification in such a world as ours.
